

Found stuck in the most unexpected place, nine baby ducklings have been rescued from drowning in a drain. Luck saved them as rain hadn't hit in a while. Witness Marie Sanchez, reported the incident at approximately 10:45 am, having said that each one followed the one before it into the drain.

After 10 exhausting minutes of desperation, the bird rescue team finally made it, and the young ducklings seemed to 'quack' with gratitude. The adorable family reunited and the mother duck led them up the pavement. Once again the mother left three ducklings, who weren't fit for the job. Put to work again, head of the team, Sam Johnson assisted them as they waddled to follow their mother.

The Chicago Police Station was packed with citizens who claimed to seek justice for what could have been the death of nine innocent lives. Debates have begun and chaos has filled the streets as news stations exaggerate what the police said was 'a very small thing'. Questions still fill the air 'should the drain gaps be smaller?'
